

Desperate Desmond

A Few Holes in a Piece of Canvas Produce a Surprising Effect

By Hershfield

Eyes of wild beasts glaring through the darkness! Even Desmond, the ruthless villain, is frightened by the sight. His path is blocked, but he resolves to send Rosamond in front of him, so that for the time, at least, the ferocious animals may be satiated, and he may make his escape. It is a plan that could occur to nobody but such an out-and-out scoundrel as Desmond is. Even the hardest heart would melt at the thought of an unprotected girl among the hungry tigers.

However, as you perhaps have guessed, the eyes of the tigers were not eyes, and there were no tigers. It was all merely an ingenious device of some Italian soldiers, who had run out of ammunition, and had to use strategy to keep possible enemies at bay. And so when Rosamond goes forward to what seems certain death, she discovers that the eyes of the tigers are merely holes in the canvas of a friendly tent.

When the light is put out the eyes disappear and Desmond thinks the wild beasts have eaten Rosamond and gone. Thus he rushes upon his doom. Once in the hands of the gallant Italians his fate is sealed! And it does not take long for Rosamond to lead the soldiers to the tree where her brave lover is a captive. Naturally Claude is glad to be rescued, and the more so since it is by his sweetheart. For Desmond's fate see to-morrow's picture.
